Collinge said the lack of legal clarity for commercial activity meant North Koreans who engaged in market activity faced the risk of arrest and detention by authorities. "The behavior that such market activity involves, including making international telephone calls and travelling within and across state borders is also criminalized and therefore subject to extortion," he said.

"This threat of arbitrary arrest and the harsh consequences that follow provide state officials with the powerful means to secure bribes from a vulnerable population," Collinge added.

The girls were students at Santas Gakuen, a Catholic school in Kawasaki city, south of Tokyo, and were waiting to board their school bus when the suspect attacked, school officials said at a news conference.

"I'm extremely angry and feel the utmost regret that this brutal act caused harm to innocent children and to their guardians who lovingly nurtured them," said school director Tetsuro Saito.

The motive for the attack was unclear but there were no immediate fears of a wider security threat.

Most mass killings involve the use of weapons or shouting. He did not say a word. That's why children did not notice" the suspect, who attacked them from behind, Shitori said.

"If he had come shouting, the children might have been able to escape," he said.

The suspect, a resident of Kawasaki, was found unconscious near the scene and died later from a self-inflicted stab wound to his neck, NHK reported, citing police.

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe described the attack as "extremely harrowing" and promised to tighten security for children coma dozen injured in western Japan earlier this month after a car involved in an accident with an err vehicle skidded into a group of school children out for a walk.
